Dating Online

Dating online has many benefits but also a multitude of drawbacks. Being online and looking for a lifetime mate or a casual friend comes with its own risks. It is obviously very effective to look online but you never know who you are meeting until it is maybe too late.

The Power of Due Diligence

The safest way to date online is to empower yourself with as much information as possible about the other person. This is not to be considered as spying on the other person but this a great way to stay safe.

You can do your own due diligence or you can appoint BCSI to perform a complete background search of the potential mate.

Be Alert!

Consider talking to the person over the phone before meeting them. It is understandable that not many people like to talk over the phone, however, if the person you are meant to be meeting claims to be a 25 year old woman and the person who speaks to you on the phone sounds like a 60 year old man, then you can confirm that the meeting should not go ahead.

One of the most important things is the location of your first few contacts. We recommend that you stay in a public area, for example, a coffee shop or restaurant may be the most appropriate. Bars may not be the best location for such meetings and staying sober is a must during the first few contacts. Make a friend or family member aware of the meeting place and time; you can also let your friend/family member know that you will be calling at regular intervals.

Planning for Success

Before going to the meeting, if you plan to buy coffee or a meal, carry as little cash as possible. As your parents possibly told you when you were younger, don't get into a car with a stranger or a person you do not know/trust yet. It is sometimes even advisable to get a friend or family member to be close by in case of a needed exit strategy.

In most of these cases, trust your gut and you can never be too careful, rather safe than sorry!
