On-line Dating and Social Media

How Safe Are You?

The true dangers of on-line dating include harassment, theft, bodily harm, and more. While these threats may seem extreme, users who log in have anonymity and predators use on-line personas to lure their victims. Always exercise caution and safety before, during, and after meeting your potential mate.

When you are using the internet to find your "soul mate", there are a number of things we quickly forget! When signing up for on-line dating sites you provide the following information:

- Name
- Date of birth
- City you reside in
- Height
- Weight (body shape)
- Eye color
- Hair color
- Marital status
- Profession (on some sites)
- Pictures of yourself
- Your credit card information (on sites that require a fee)

Once you are signed up and looking for your "match", domestic and international con-artists/scammers are looking for you. With you providing all of your personal information, you are inviting these people in to your home.

People today are more conscious than ever about their on-line safety and security. The con-artist/scammers are well aware of this, and are starting to up their game. International scammers are hiring outside individuals who have a perfect command of the English language, and are in turn setting up the sites in such a way that there is no way to tell if the "on-line dating site" or "person" is legitimate.

The danger of misrepresentation is very strong. If a man states he is a woman with two kids, nothing can dispute this fact until the couple actually meets in person for the first time. Prior to the first meeting, you should always do your due diligence on the on-line identity you have been talking to.

BCSI can search databases that are not accessible to the public, to help ensure your safety and peace of mind. Call us to book a consultation at 604-922-6572.
